Yesterday, Google released a brief blog post about the next version of Android – O, or Android 9 Pie. They also released a video about the UI changes that are coming with the new Android Pie update. Now that we have all the information about the new Android update, we can get to the juicy bits, right? No, the most interesting bit is the UI change that will eventually become standard on Android devices. For years, Google has been in a partnership with a Japanese OS company called SoftBank. This partnership has produced the Nexus 5X, Nexus 6P, and the upcoming Pixel phones. On those phones, SoftBank uses a UI that is pretty much visually identical to Google's own Material Design. Google's Pixel 2 and 2 XL have a customizable and very Material Design-looking dial. And, the addition of the Digital Wellbeing tab shows that Google is serious about creating a more Material Design look and feel for the Android system. What is new? Android Pie will have a new tab for Google News. The other big change in Android Pie is the fact that it will get a new tab in the app drawer for Google News. That new tab will look a lot like the new Google search tab that has made its way into Chrome for desktop and mobile users. It will replace the “Recent Apps” tab that shows you the last six apps you’ve used. Android Pie will also add a new Google News tab in the app drawer. The new Google News tab will show you top news stories based on your location and interests. There will also be a new feature in the Google News app called Collections. Collections is essentially a folder of articles that you can save for viewing later. You can set up your own collections, or you can simply create a collection of articles that you want to read later. You can now create an audio collection, a video collection, a text collection, a photo collection, or a web collection. These collections can be easily shared with the people in your social networks. The temporal parietal junction (TPJ) is involved in semantic processing. The right TPJ was shown to be involved in the modulation of language processing. The left TPJ was also reported to be involved in attention modulation. Here, we studied the TPJ as a center for attention modulation. In adolescents, we examined the connectivity of the left and right TPJ with the frontal lobe and the anterior and posterior brainstem regions. Based on the existing literature, we hypothesize that the right TPJ is functionally coupled with the left prefrontal cortex (PFC) during an early phase of language and attention modulation, whereas the left TPJ is functionally coupled with the right PFC and the left anterior brainstem/mesencephalon during a later phase of attention modulation. During a language decision task in adolescents, we found significant connections of the left and right TPJ with the frontal lobe and the anterior brainstem/mesencephalon. Moreover, connections of the left but not the right TPJ with the left PFC were observed during an attention modulation task. Furthermore, activation of the left TPJ was observed during a language task and higher activation of the left compared with the right TPJ was observed during an attention task. This suggests that the left TPJ may already be affected by the functional coupling with the anterior brainstem and PFC.Q: Image freezes when clicked on I have an image in my home page, it seems to work fine, but whenever I click anywhere on the image to preview a pdf it freezes the whole browser.
