What's new:

Meddik Devdad Rezrog Meddik Devdad (, also Romanized as Rezrog Meddik Devdād; also known as Rezrūghābād) is a village in Negur Rural District, Dashtiari District, Chabahar County, Sistan and Baluchestan Province, Iran. At the 2006 census, its population was 24, in 6 families. References Category:Populated places in Chabahar CountyQ: What is the difference between kettle of fish and calamity? Both of these words appear in TV and radio programs and they seem to mean the same thing. Could anyone please explain, or is my understanding correct? A: A kettle of fish is a very complicated event. A calamity is as much a disaster as a kettle of fish. From OALD 7 Simple words that can make or break your writing Q: Antimatter in Computer Searching online I found many articles talking about the possible discovery of Antimatter in sensors as a cause of noise in decryption. However, most of these articles are written around 3-4 years ago, I wonder if the reality has changed regarding this subject since, because the current state of the art can explain this phenomenon without needing the matter-antimatter theory. Has anyone has found something more recent related to the subject matter? A: Antimatter has been successfully produced in the lab (using normal matter!), and it's predicted that it's possible to create it in the future in abundance. There's nothing currently known that predicts it's possible to catch and store antimatter, when in fact it's easy to do. It's just a matter of collecting antiprotons and attaching them magnetically to antiprotons. Then keeping them bound for a long period of time to avoid "glitching". First actual claimed success in antimatter trapping was the LUX detector, which declared a dark matter signal and that was subsequently disproved, but there has since been a few other experiments that have claimed successes in the same (same particle, different target!) experiment, but the "losses" in the control group are
