on the methods and algorithms for high-resolution grid generation. We believe that, within the current limitations, our model provides a reasonable surrogate of the CMPD generated by CD8$^+$ T cell dynamics. The human immune system consists of many cells types, including a large subset of lymphocytes, such as CD8$^+$ T cells, B cells and myeloid cells, which can recognize a wide variety of pathogens and carry out a multitude of functions. Typically, these are regulated in a coordinated manner, often limiting the clinical impact of single cell types. However, the field of oncology has demonstrated that the immune response may not be as complex as previously thought and, at least in a subset of cancers, host immunity may counter-regulate tumor cells rather than eradicate them (Alici A et al., 2018). The immune system of the mouse is considerably simpler than that of humans, which is one of the reasons that experimental tumor models have been preferred. Nevertheless, the data obtained from such approaches have given rise to new questions as to how the CD8$^+$ T cell-based immunity functions in humans (Ding and Rock, 2012). To make our model more consistent with the data obtained from human studies, we took into account the additional cell types that are present in the immune system of humans. We developed a modeling framework, in which the addition of new cell types and other modeling parameters are easily incorporated, and thus provides a simple and uniform way of increasing the complexity of the model. Importantly, we demonstrated that our model exhibits physiological-like dynamic properties. Specifically, the regulation of the immune system in its different functional components is mediated by regulatory T cells (Tregs), which are an important component of the host immune response against cancer. In order to be active Tregs need to undergo a specific program of cell maturation, through which they acquire self-reactivity and immunosuppressive capabilities (Trinchieri
