Who Infiltrated the KGB & Disneyland An English physicist, Sir James Douglas, was also in charge of the design of Disneyland. He won the 1962 Nobel Prize for Physics. The English scientist was co-author of a book on mathematical techniques in nuclear physics. He worked at the Atomic Energy Research Establishment in Teddington, near London. His name was James C. Douglas. In 1956, in the recently established underground facility at the Pentagon, a particularly clever spy tried to convince the enemy that the Western allies were profoundly interested in codes and in methods of breaking codes. And so the Soviet apparat collected pieces of information and transmitted them to agents in Western countries, in the hope of learning some useful secrets. One of those came from an agent stationed in California, most likely because in California there are thousands of people who can pass as foreigners. The name of the agent is John Russell, born John Goodsell. He has a moustache, light skin, blond hair and blue eyes. However, he had a strange, opaque brown coat, filled with secret pockets. He took numerous recordings of conversations with the hostess of the propaganda radio station. Another source was a man in an air force base who was ordered to pass instructions to his contacts via Morse code. Another was a female scientist, born in Jerusalem but now living in Los Angeles. She taught a group of people to understand and recognise coded messages. She divided her pupils into groups of six, and for each message they took turns reading the message aloud. They spent their time in secrecy, without anyone seeing their gestures. These well-named agents were sourced in and reported by colleagues working at the British nuclear facility in Harwell, near Oxford. In 1959, while studying for a doctorate at Cambridge, a mathematical physicist by the name of Dorothy Healey dated John Russell. They were close friends with a secret meeting of the two. Russell spent a great deal of time at Healey's home, and there they discussed the encryption system that had been developed for the US administration. Their motto: "Big is hard, but small is easy". Dorothy Healey crossed the Atlantic Ocean several times between 1959-61. She wanted to forget the dangerous job that she had just taken. She resided in Bloomington, Indiana, invited friends and visited her aunt, who also lived there. In 1961, she received a
