GamesBeat: But the long-standing fantasy RPG genre also has a long history of its own history, so how did you decide to create your own original story? Noumenon: The Elder Scrolls has been a huge inspiration. That famous series has always left behind a great impression on me. Furthermore, we wanted to create a game with an astonishing level of immersion. We wanted to design something that would make you feel as though you were playing a role in that world with this story. GamesBeat: And the decision to have a multilayered structure that intertwines a story in online mode with others in a non-online story seems like a natural evolution from what you've done in the past. Noumenon: It is a natural evolution from Tales of Innocence, as well as from the Tales of Berseria and Tales of Graces games. With the Tales series, we've been able to play the main story while making various interactions with the world while playing in online mode, and we've been able to explore the world in offline mode at the same time. We made Tales of Berseria so that the story in the main scenario would seamlessly transition into Tales of Zestiria. It's been four years since Tales of Zestiria, but we wanted to create something that would allow us to expand on those conversations between Ayla and Adol and Ken. We were able to create something that's really fun for the fans. That was a key reason why we created Tales of Averoia, too. GamesBeat: Nowadays, you're adding familiar elements such as summoning a familiar to old-school RPGs, so what kind of new gameplay are you looking to add? Noumenon: Since the game is set in a fantasy world, we decided to have a technical challenge in mind when we decided on the idea that we should have battles that would be relatable to the real world. We're trying to combine a game that could easily come out in your smartphone with the technical capabilities of consoles, such as the PlayStation 4 or Xbox One. We're also considering supporting a four-player online connection in Averoia. There are times when the action is crazy and you want to team up with your friends to kill something together, so we want to support that. If it's four-player online bff6bb2d33
