One in 10 mothers said they would not let their children eat those foods and some said they would allow them on rare occasions, while a further 13% said they would allow such meals on a regular basis. The survey, by the parenting site's food adviser, Rachel Crane, was conducted by Survation between April and May 2017. It showed that mum's biggest barrier to allowing their children to eat biscuits with gravy was the high sugar content, followed by the fact that the meal is unhealthy. Half of the mothers said children should not have biscuits with gravy, while a similar percentage said they should not eat bread with eggs and chips. Posting on the Mumsnet discussion board, user Natalie said children should not be allowed to eat biscuits with gravy, saying it was one of the worst foods. "I had biscuits with gravy, bread and butter and tea with milk a few years ago and was sick within half an hour. So no thanks," she said. User Anonymous said she would let her children eat biscuits with gravy on a rare occasion, adding that they were "just too sweet and too sticky to be a regular staple of a child's diet".
