The aim of this study is to evaluate the outcome of secondary upper limb replantation after limb salvage surgery in lower limb replantation. Between January 2000 and January 2008, 16 patients underwent 20 upper limb replantations and 5 patients underwent 5 lower limb replantations. Ten of 20 upper limb replantations were caused by crush injuries and 6 by sharp injuries. Two patients had forearm amputation, and another 2 patients had metacarpophalangeal disarticulation. Primary replantation attempts were performed in 15 patients and secondary in 5 patients. At the time of admission, most patients had soft-tissue or bone defects, and a majority had vascular compromise in the limb. Successful replantation was achieved in all cases. Complications were observed in 12 replanted upper limbs (60%), and 3 patients suffered osteomyelitis in their replanted upper limbs. Secondary upper limb replantation following lower limb replantation is technically difficult, and the chances of successful replantation are reduced in cases with difficulty in donor vessel selection. However, if achievable, replantation is successful in all cases.Q: Why does Clojure have bytecode but the Python interpreter doesn't? It has been said that Clojure code is "verified" so that it can catch bugs more efficiently than Python code. In Python, I am always made aware that I am running the wrong version of some library. In that case, why would there
