The effects of ethylene glycol monoethyl ether (EGEE) on rat fetuses at 20 mg/kg/day orally on days 6-15 of gestation were evaluated. The most sensitive organ was testes, where there was a decrease in relative weight in males. In some cases, seminiferous tubule necrosis was present, together with significant increases in relative testes weights. Gonadal and liver weights were also increased significantly. Further experiments with rabbit fetuses were conducted with similar administration of 100 mg/kg/day orally from days 6-15 of gestation. Livers were significantly enlarged in fetuses, particularly males, at different stages of development. Deaths were recorded at different gestational periods. It is concluded that EGEE is a potent teratogenic compound that could lead to the production of embryos with profound abnormalities.
