.The invention concerns a machine for tying a knot in a rope, wherein a knot tying line attached on a knot tying device is drawn and reeled off from the knot tying device and the rope is then passed around the knot tying line and tied together. A generic machine is known from U.S. Pat. No. 5,857,610. With this machine a knot is tied after the rope is drawn through the entire length of the knot tying device. This necessitates that the rope must be guided through the entire length of the knot tying device before the knot is tied, and also, due to the abrupt change in diameter of the rope at the knot tying device, there is a risk of the knot slipping and becoming untied. It is an object of the invention to provide a machine which, on the one hand, facilitates the tie tying operation by providing a gradual diameter change of the rope at the knot tying device and, on the other hand, is capable of tying a knot which is resistant to slipping. According to the invention there is provided a machine for tying a knot in a rope, wherein a knot tying line attached to a knot tying device is drawn and reeled off from the knot tying device and the rope is then passed around the knot tying line and tied together, wherein the machine comprises means for guiding the rope on an extended section of the knot tying line, the extended section being located downstream of the knot tying device and the rope is guided along the extended section of the knot tying line in a straight line. This solution is an improvement over the prior art in that the rope will first make a gradual diameter change at the downstream end of the knot tying device and then pass through the downstream end of the extended section of the knot tying line. The knotting operation can then be carried out in the extended section of the knot tying line with the rope guided in a straight line. This means that the rope being tied will first have a gradual change of diameter, which means that the knot will have a constant diameter at a given point and yet the diameter can be made greater through having the rope drawn off along a straight line. For other purposes than tying a knot in a rope, the machine can comprise a mechanism for setting a predetermined distance of drawing of the knot tying line. The tension in the extended section of the knot tying line may be adjusted by means of a tensioning device, for example, a spindle with a spindle nut connected on one end of the extended section of the knot 6d1f23a050
