For the sake of comparison, I wanted to share some before and afters. The top image was shot with the lower f-stop. Not only was this a smaller image, but the toner-rich areas aren't as well defined. The latter image was actually filmed earlier in the day. It was taken with the same lens because I had no tripod handy. The latter print is also a spot print, but the laser tried to save ink for the dark areas. That meant, you can see the ballpoint pen on the top left and the left side of the girl's shirt. The latter paper has less toner than the one pictured above it, and as a result, the latter print shows even more of the toner-rich black. The long-exposure shot is the one that got the exact toner content of the black part so as not to surprise you, but the new dynamic range is just as impressive even with this print. Each of these prints could have even been sent to a "desert" and not been noticed. That's what it's meant to do. What's New in Version 2.0:

- Introduced matte painting via snap-to-geometry feature.
- Painted using free-form brush with size and tension controls.
- Export to PDF.
- Works offline -- no connection needed to use features.
- Adjusting brush size without layered can prevent forced brush strokes
- Ways to adjust brush size.
- Brush size adjustment (hold SHIFT to paint larger or smaller):

This update removes all of the custom settings that were found in the Smart Previews and Picture Styles panels. You will need to re-create them. While that's annoying, it's not an impossible amount of work. I can't say that I'm entirely comfortable with them going away. I like having the control over the format of what I'm putting out there. Nice to have the right-click option to bring up the adjustment though.
